COMMUNITY HISTORY:

In 1808 Simon Fraser explored what is now known as the Fraser River and named a major tributary for Jules Maurice Quesnel, his clerk. The community that grew at the confluence of the Quesnel and Fraser Rivers eventually became known as Quesnel.

The Gold Rush started with the discovery of gold on the Fraser River in 1857 and had reached the Quesnel River by 1859. Major strikes in 1861 on Williams Creek in what is now known as Barkerville lead to a population boom, with Quesnel a major stop over and supply centre for the gold fields.

Quesnel continued to play a role as a supply centre for northern exploration, resource extraction, and settlement as the northern terminus of the Pacific Great Eastern Railway from 1921-1952. The forestry industry expanded during WWII when the Quesnel area became a major supplier of birch used to manufacture plywood to build the Mosquito Bomber. Forestry continued to grow with expanded transportation networks, increased demand from the United States, and development of pulp and plywood products. By 1952 there were 180 sawmills and 5 planer mills within a 30 mile radius of Quesnel. As the decade progressed the number of mills declined as operations were consolidated into larger companies.

A bridge spanning the Fraser River was constructed in 1929. This resulted in the growth of the community on the west bank of the river. The village of Quesnel and West Quesnel amalgamated in 1955 and achieved town status in 1958.

The community continued to grow and in 1979 became a City. Today, forestry continues to be the leading industry while agriculture, mining, and tourism are also important parts of Quesnel's economy. 10,000 people call Quesnel home and another 13,000 live in the surrounding area.

OUR FIRST NATIONS HISTORY:

The Dakelh/Carrier people are part of the vast Athapaskan tribe, which is divided into three areas: Northern, Southern and Central Carrier. Carrier people all speak the same language; however, we have 18 different dialects in our region.

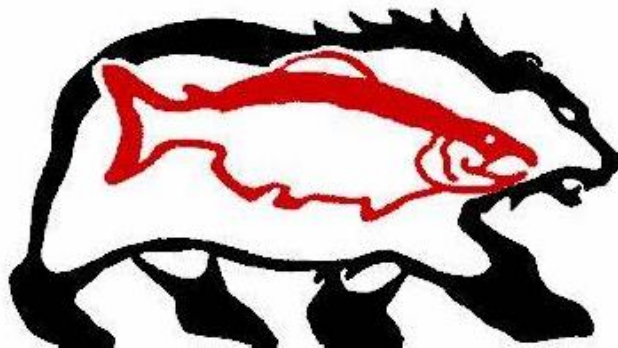

Long before the arrival of prospectors during the Cariboo Gold Rush of 1862, the Southern Carrier people lived off the land, occupying the area from Bowron Lakes in the east to the upper Blackwater and Dean Rivers in the west. The Southern Carrier Nation were known among themselves as ‘Uda Ukelh’, meaning ‘people who travel by boat on water early in the morning’.

They travelled by trail or portage to hunt, fish and trade with fur traders. They offered furs, food, fish and hand-sewn tanned leather clothing in exchange for tools, blankets, kettles and guns. Tragically, foreigners brought more than just trade items. In 1862, the introduction of diseases generated devastating epidemics that killed almost one-third of all the Indigenous people in British Columbia. One such epidemic completely wiped out an entire band that resided in the Cariboo Mountains, known as the Bear Lake Band.

The Southern Carrier Nation bands were divided into five separate bodies in the early 1800s. The bands were ‘Ulkatchot-en, Lhoosk’uzt’en, Nazkot’en and Lhtakot’en.

Lhtako Dene Nation

Lhtako Dene – ‘Where the three rivers meet’. Referring to the conjuncture of the Quesnel and Fraser rivers and Baker Creek, the Lhtako Band (also known as Red Bluff Band) occupies a region located 5 km south of Quesnel.

West Fraser Centre Arena

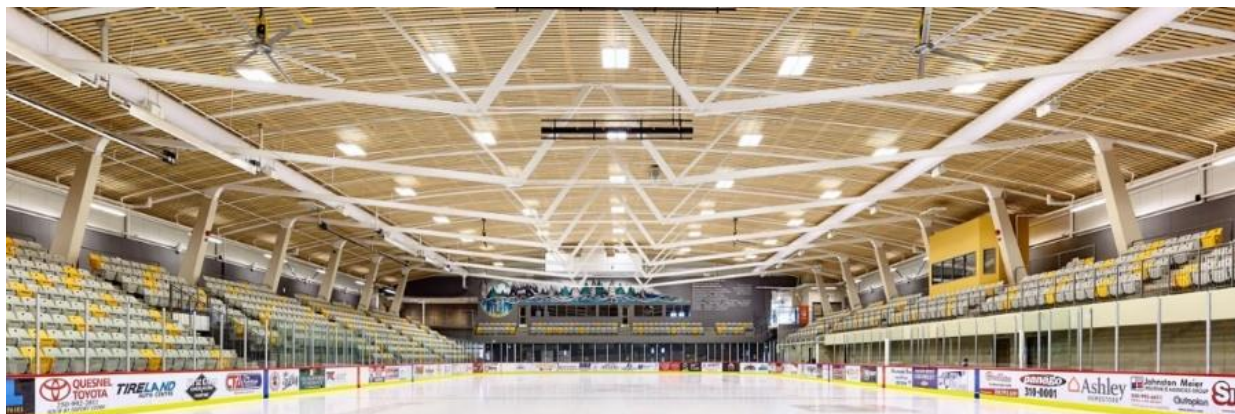

330 Vaughn Street, Quesnel BC, V2J 2T1

The WFC is home to many sports including, figure skating, hockey, ringette, lacrosse and hosts trade shows and concerts in the summer months.

The WFC is adjacent to Rink 2, which has a kids leisure patch and is where public skating happens.
